Bug reporting AutoCAD has an extensive bug reporting system called Autodesk Technical Support Portal (ATS). ATS contains tools to locate problems and also includes a Support Phone, Feedback form, Support articles, community forum, Bug database, and an online Help (vBulletin-based) forum. Dependency issues AutoCAD has dependency issues in which some functions work only in specific release software or applications. Functionality may also be unavailable in products that are in Beta, which is an early release version of a product. Licensing AutoCAD requires a registration key or product activation code to install and run. In addition, AutoCAD is distributed by AutoDesk, Inc. and sold through distribution channels such as resellers. The AutoDesk version is called AutoCAD LT, and requires no registration and no activation. The only difference between the two is that the more recent AutoCAD LT is bundled with "Autodesk Revit," which is part of the AutoCAD LT Suite, and comes in a software package as opposed to an AutoCAD LT package. The LT Suite also includes Bentley MicroStation and a variety of AutoCAD applications. AutoCAD LT 2009, AutoCAD LT 2010 and AutoCAD LT 2011 are all still distributed by AutoDesk and retail for $79.00, $99.00 and $129.00, respectively. The other version, AutoCAD, is distributed by Autodesk, Inc. and is sold through resellers. AutoCAD does not distribute AutoCAD Civil 3D. This application was spun off as an independent product in 2006. Software AutoCAD (LT) Autodesk AutoCAD is a computer-aided design (CAD) program. Following a court ruling that Tesla had violated its settlement agreement with the U.S. government, the electric car maker is still waiting to be allowed to sell directly to the public, but is making progress in improving its service centers. The company agreed to settle a whistleblower case by the Department of Justice, and agreed to pay a $418 million fine in 2017. The company also agreed to establish a "body shop" for customers who have trouble with their electric cars, which would replace the "Tesla Museum" in Palo Alto. A federal judge in San Francisco has been pushing Tesla to improve its stores, including one in Los Angeles, but the company has refused to do so. When Tesla started offering vehicle servicing and repairs, the company made all its service centers independent companies, with their own business models. However, the company's head of customer service service, Steve Fraizer, recently told investors that he wants Tesla to operate an "integrated" model, with the same teams handling service and repairs across its network. Tesla also has a store in its service center at the Palo Alto service center, where staff can give hand-holding information on electric vehicles, and provide recommendations. The Los Angeles service center, meanwhile, doesn't have a store. Last week, a California judge ruled that Tesla is violating the terms of the company's settlement, because they haven't been opening stores where customers can go and pick up their vehicle. To resolve this problem, Tesla is now opening a showroom at their Palo Alto service center, where customers can go to see the company's vehicles and test drive them. Tesla: We didn't comply with our settlement agreement with the Justice Department because the Los Angeles service center is not allowed to have a showroom. We're changing that today by opening a showroom. Our stores and galleries are available to all Tesla owners. pic.twitter.com/k1hYln8bsa — Brad Stone (@bradstone) August 11, 2019 Last week, the company also sent out emails to every Tesla owner,
