Description of the Related Art Surgical staplers have been in use for many years. Many different types of surgical staplers are available, with the most common type being that described in U.S. Pat. No. 4,354,628, which is incorporated herein by reference. Many of the products presently marketed are variations on the '628 stapler, which includes a staple-forming anvil and a staple-forming cutting member which can be used interchangeably with a stack of staples formed on the anvil. In the '628 patent, the anvil and the cutting member are pressed together by a camming action of a coupling member on one of the anvil and the cutting member. This coupling member includes a drive cam, a bridge cam, and a pressing cam. These cams are engaged by a drive shaft of a motor. An actuator, which engages the drive cam, is slidably connected to the bridge cam. As the drive shaft rotates, the actuator moves longitudinally along the bridge cam, applying the force required to urge the anvil and the cutting member together. In use, a sheet of tissue is positioned between the anvil and the cutting member, and the anvil is pushed through the tissue, causing the anvil and the tissue to be pressed together. The cutting member then enters the tissue. The cams begin to rotate, and the actuator moves laterally along the bridge cam, pressing the connecting link and the actuator into contact with the drive cam. This

Most Popular Posts 5 things I learned about blogging from creating this site The five most important things I've learned in my first six months of blogging, and some tips on how you can do them too. 1. WRITE If you don't have anything to say, no one will read your blog. And blogging is so much more than simply saying what you want to say: If you're writing to promote a product, you'll lose readers. So write! In your own voice, of course -- "My writing style is short and to the point, with a bent for the naughty and the beautiful. I look for the laugh-out-loud parts and emotional parts that run deep and are easily relatable." And if you're writing about a topic you know a lot about, such as beauty, don't be afraid to experiment. Remember, even if you're only writing just for yourself, your voice needs to be strong. 2. WORK THE HOOVES Build your readership. Hire a PR agency or an SEO firm to help you do it. I've had a great experience working with Thank You PR, whose mission is to help bloggers get media coverage by working the sidelines. I've had other great PR agencies, too: Belle Complexity and Writers With Pencils are two I've worked with, and I'm currently in the midst of doing a campaign with Lawyerist's pro-bono writing service. In the beginning, you'll probably feel overwhelmed as you try to navigate the hooves of beauty- and fashion-related PR. But I'm here to tell you that after a while, it will get easier. It's part of a learning process that takes time, practice, patience, and some good advice. And of course, make sure your ads have headlines that are good and relevant and look like they came right from your blog. (By the way, the side-hooving is important, too. The bottom line: All marketing involves hooves. If you're not hooving -- chasing potential new readers and paying your bills -- you're not doing much to promote yourself.) 3. BE RELIABLE Don't rely on your readership to make you money. If you want to make money from a blog, you need to work for it. It's sad but true. I didn't get started on my own when I first started blogging because I thought I could just be happy
