20 years in the making, the New South Wales Syringe Access Program (NSSA) now has a new home. In June 2019, the NSW Law Society agreed to provide the legal services to the New South Wales Ministry of Health to establish the program on-line. The purpose of the program is to reduce the harm caused by inappropriate use of drugs and sharps. This includes injury to users themselves, to those who provide support or services to them, or to those around them. Sharing an online version of the NSSA will allow information about the risks of injection and safety procedures for those who inject or receive injections to be made publicly available. This will be done through video presentations and online training materials about the risks of injection, safety procedures for injection sites, sterile syringe and sharps disposal, and professional and lay support services for drug and injection-related harm reduction. Will the program be available to all people who need it? Yes. The on-line program will be available for anyone who is a NSW resident over 18 years of age, who is not able to access publicly funded healthcare in the course of their usual activities, or who is subject to a court order for treatment by a practitioner in a pharmacology unit. We will provide access to the program to the people who need it through a range of information sources and through referral by others who have already had an intervention. We will also establish networks and resources for practitioners who are able to provide some of the services available through the program. This may include practice groups, medical schools, and regulatory bodies. Please use this link to learn more about the New South Wales
