Starting your image editing adventure Image editing can be a daunting prospect for beginners, even if you're an experienced photo taker. Good thing that it's no harder than any other creative medium. All you need to do is start with a well-lit photograph and then add a little bit of editing. The Photoshop interface is a little different, though, and can be intimidating to the uninitiated. But don't be intimidated — to get going, take your time and learn one feature at a time. To get started, make sure your image is in portrait orientation, about 4 inches wide by 6 inches tall — no more and no less. Click the arrow on the toolbar near the top of the image window (shown in Figure 14-1) and choose Edit⇒

Snow/Ice on Starting Valves I have a question regarding starting valves. I have installed our new sprinkler system a little over a week ago, and I have been noticing a problem with the starting valves. Sometimes as a result of a storm, I will start to notice that the ground near the valves fills with snow and ice. It seems to happen more when it's cold like tonight and less when it's a balmy day in the spring. This morning I plugged all my valves in the ground and when I turned them on there was no water, so I am assuming there is just ice/snow in the pipes, right? Can this cause the valves to break off inside the ground? Can the ice/snow bust up the bottom of the valve cover? I'm just wondering because I had a problem like this with a sprinkler system not too long ago. I don't remember what it was, but I think it was because of salt crystals on the lines. Not sure what the problem is there. If there's any freezing in the line, it's going to affect the system as a whole (inertia), but if it's just ice at the bottom of the valves, that's just like you said - not much to worry about. I would guess it could be due to the valve cover floating around in the soil. It has to have something to keep it in place or it would float. The cover should be sitting at the bottom of the pipe. I've dug a fair bit around sprinkler heads and noticed the earth gets soft and settles in one spot. Did this actually happen or was your comment more of a jest? Have you seen this on any systems before? Has this ever happened to anyone else? The Valve cover is designed so when the valve is closed (to protect the valve from freezing or excess pressure), the valve cover does not contact the ground. When the valve is open, the valve cover is free to be pulled out. When the valve is closed and the water flow through the
