After the most recent national violence report was released, an ambulance with the lights and sirens activated raced to the Stellenbosch Football Association. Female counsellors and nurse were busy scurrying around to find a place to put a frantic young woman who was leaving her pitch to get to the hospital. The ambulance was parked outside one of the smaller bars in the city, and she apparently had been on the verge of passing out due to a urinary tract infection. But in Cape Town, sexual violence is usually in the hospital, due to the fact that it's easier for hospitals to link the sexual violence, with other illnesses. Most of the time, the perpetrators are known to these institutions, and even if it is the boyfriend or father or someone we consider to be "like a father", they will know. What makes a woman vulnerable? Based on that experience, after going through the first wave of sexual violence, various systems are required. Unfortunately, all of them are failing, as Cape Town's City Health Services spokesperson Nana Moatshe says in the aftermath of the fifth National Violence report, and the current statistics are quite disturbing. "Two out of three victims are not provided with police assistance in investigating cases of abuse. Even when they report the abuse to police, chances of the perpetrator being arrested are slim. "Without reliable evidence, the perpetrator can stay in the house and the victim is forced to leave the place she has been attacked in. "As a result, cases of sexual assault often go unreported. "However, the situation is improving. First, the provision of services to victims has increased, as shown by the number of SA Police Service (SAPS) cases referred to the Gender Violence Forensic Services." According to Moatshe, the change in attitude towards violence d0c515b9f4
