This special function uses a different exchange protocol and has better performance. However, the C11 standard (N1570) does not mandate the existence of the specialized exchange function. Since C++11, atomic_compare_exchange is guaranteed to be an atomic RMW operation. But should that hold for the exchange() function? std::atomic m_value; void handler() { int old; while(1) { old = m_value; // some code that changes m_value atomically //... do_something_involving_m_value(old); } } Are all the operations inside the do_something_involving_m_value() function guaranteed to be atomically observable? A: Yes, all of them are guaranteed to be atomic by the standard. From [atomics.type]: Atomically updating the value at an atomic_storage object by setting atomically the value of the reference to an object stored in the atomic_storage object to a desired new value. If the reference is a modifiable reference to an atomic_storage object, the atomic operation leaves the original value of the reference unchanged. The value of the reference is its current value until the reference is assigned to a new value
